The Uncommon Connection: My Journey with the Normal Girl in 2014.

thelifeofmine3.wordpress.com/2022/03/09/me-and-normal-girl-2014/

March 9, 2022

My Journey with the Normal Girl in 2014.

Amma and Appa held contrasting views on my situation. While Amma wanted me to be happy, Appa hoped for my eventual recovery and improvement. I had a sense that God had a greater plan for me. Regardless of my age, I would continue to believe in God and trust in His guidance. I knew that having faith in God helped me cope with the stress and challenges I faced, even if it meant living with my condition for the rest of my life. I recognized that compared to the typical experiences of a girl, the only loss I had was the ability to walk. But despite this, I felt surrounded by joy in the presence of my parents, friends, and others who provided me with unwavering support and made me feel secure. I held onto the hope that one day, I would be able to walk, even though I didn't know when or how it would happen.

My faith in God gave me the strength to face any obstacles, and I deeply cherished my relationship with Him.My desire was for the world to see me as someone new and unique, beyond the limitations of my physical abilities. Even if I couldn't walk, my greatest accomplishment in life would be the unwavering faith and belief I had in God. It was through God's grace that I began to understand the meaning and purpose of my life.